Jennie Q. Colabella: Went through the project requirements (Professor Denizard's list on Blackboard) point by point with the team so they're clear about what's expected. We reviewed what we have and what's still needed. Also keeping track of required paperwork, links that might be helpful to the team, and standards that have to be met.

The last ~40 minutes of the meeting Chris wanted to have a discussion with me about the database. He said he created his own database. I had link tables in version 6 that Chris asked me to remove. After I removed them he created an entirely new database (hvav_db_v99.1.sql) and added the link tables back in. He showed me his code (basically an entire rewrite) and explained his tables. He started talking about the database in terms of what he and I are doing (like it's a joint task) and offered to get together with me and Professor Denizard to "get on the same page"). He said he'd send me two copies of the database (one with notes to explain it and one for me to import "if I want" which would entirely overwrite all of the code I've written for this project). I told him I wanted the table/fields he needs for the z report and I'd look at the others, but I planned to meet with Professor Denizard on my own.
